122. In the first place, we must consider the nature of the thing itself. It is not a simple, homogeneous substance, but a complex, heterogeneous one. It is composed of many different parts, each of which has its own peculiar properties. These parts are united together in such a way as to form a single, coherent whole. This whole is the thing itself, and it is this whole that we are concerned with in our study. We must therefore, in the first place, consider the nature of the thing itself, and then we must consider the nature of the parts of which it is composed. This is the first principle of our study, and it is the foundation upon which we must build all our knowledge.

In the second place, we must consider the nature of the knowledge that we are seeking. It is not a mere collection of facts, but a system of ideas. These ideas are connected together in such a way as to form a single, coherent whole. This whole is the knowledge itself, and it is this whole that we are concerned with in our study. We must therefore, in the second place, consider the nature of the knowledge that we are seeking, and then we must consider the nature of the ideas of which it is composed.
